In 1875 a sore appeared on my nose, and grew rapidly. As my father had cancer, and my husband died of it, I became alarmed, and consulted my physician. His treatment did no good, and the sore grew larger and worse in every way until I had concluded that I was to die from its effects. I was persuaded to take S. S. S. and a few bottles cured me. This was after all the doctors and other medicines had failed. I have had no return of the cancer.

MAKING CIDER VINEGAR.

Timely Suggestions Based on Experience and Observation.

Many of our large orchardists use the entire product of their orchards, that is not desirable as fruit, in making vinegar. The agricultural editor of The New York World tells how this is done. As soon as enough apples have fallen to furnish a supply, these are ground up in any kind of a cider mill and the juice may be pressed out at once and be left to ferment and sour, but it is better to keep the pomace in open vats or casks until it has thoroughly fermented, when the juice will be more easily and completely separated from the pomace than if pressed at the time of grinding.

After the pressing is over the sour liquor is put into open casks to settle and is afterwards racked off into barrels not quite full, leaving the sediment in the bottom of the casks. To get the benefit of the warm fall weather these barrels should stand out in the sun, but be covered with loose boards to protect the coopers. On the advent of cold weather the barrels ought to be removed into the vinegar house, where there should be a stove or some good arrangement for warming the house that will keep up a mild and even temperature through the winter. Many who have through the winter convenience put the barrels into their cellars to prevent freezing and bring them out again in the spring; but when the liquor can be kept above ground and in a warm and dry atmosphere the souring process will go on much better.

Experience has shown that keeping the liquor in packages of barrel size will secure the desired acidity sooner and better than when stored in large open tanks. Throughout the whole process, until the vinegar is made and no greater acidity is desired, the barrels should remain unbunged, with a small piece of netting tacked over the bung-hole to keep out insects. The barrels should be iron hoops and be kept thoroughly well painted.

Some dilution is often necessary in the manufacture, as, where there is an excess of saccharine matter in the juice, it will be too slow in turning to the acid condition without a proper addition of water. All the varieties of summer, fall and winter apples may be used together indiscriminately in making vinegar. During the process the chemical changes eliminate from the juice everything that could identify it as the product of any particular variety.

Making vinegar by the natural process will require at least one year, but it will continue to grow stronger and better the longer it is kept. In the first stage of the making the sugar in the juice is turned by fermentation into alcohol and carbonic acid. The acid, being a gas, bubbles to the surface and escapes, while the alcohol is retained. The richer the juice is in the sugar, the more alcohol it will contain after fermentation.

To make vinegar, the alcohol is changed by oxidation into acetic acid, and when this is accomplished the vinegar is made. But when alcohol exists in liquids in large proportions it will hinder or entirely prevent its own change into acetic acid. Thus, when a small amount of water is added to whisky it simply weakens the proof, while if the amount is large the whole will turn to vinegar.

So apple juice too rich in sugar may remain after fermentation in the condition of hard cider for years, unless it is diluted with water, for the reason that it contains too much alcohol for a speedy change. Making vinegar may be hastened by running it slowly in a small stream from one barrel to another a few feet distant, exposing it more fully in its divided form to the action of the atmosphere, or by trickling it down through bench chips, shavings or corn cobs saturated with old vinegar, or by the addition of a gallon or two of strong vinegar to each barrel of cider.

Sheep and Calves in the Corn Fields.
Weeds are likely to escape in the later cultivation of the corn and other weeds spring up after cultivation is ended. It is these weeds which foul the field and for future years. The weeds in the corn field are neglected during the hurry of grain and hay harvest, threshing, hauling manure and preparing the ground for wheat. But even better than is the scythe, says The American Agriculturist, are the sheep. Let them have the run of the corn fields during the autumn. They like the shade of the rows. They will nibble off the lower blades of the corn, but this is in no way an injury to the crop. The sheep will also find every weed and bunch of grass. Their scent is sharp, and they will discover weeds that would be overlooked. There are very few weeds indeed that will not be cropped by sheep, especially by the Merino breed; they crop so close to the ground that the weeds will hardly start again. The spring calves, if not too strong, may well be put with the sheep. Unless unusually large, they will not damage the corn and will get considerable feed which would otherwise be wasted.

A Chicken Cholera Cure.
According to Southern Farmer the negroes all over Georgia, and we are informed all over the south, saturate corn, whole corn, in kerosene oil and feed to flocks of fowls when cholera is prevalent. We are told that this is an effective cure of the disease, and preventive of contagion.

Timely Suggestions.
The question as to early or late sowing of grain has never been settled, although the majority of farmers sow early. Progressive farmers are generally agreed on the superiority of drilling in grain seeds over sowing in broadcast.

Now is the time to plant spring flowering bulbs, such as tulips, hyacinths, crocus, narcissus and the like.
The honey crop is a poor one in most sections, owing to the results of heavy and continuous rains.

Asparagus plants may be set out either in autumn, after they have ceased to grow, or in the spring.
Several weeks should elapse between the sowing of grain and of the grass seeds.
